NO FAIRY TALE.

A CURIOUS trait in human nature is that which not only allows but seems even to encourage the multitude of seductive schemes that are so constantly developed for unscrupulous money-making through the deceiving of the credulous. It seems no longer true—

"If weak thy faith,
 Why choose the harder side?"

For those timid ones whose faith in most things is surely weakest are just the ones most often caught by the hardest story presented for belief.

It ought certainly to be "the hardest side" for faith when one is told that in this certain company, or in that certain scheme, each invested dollar will bring back ten, and ten per cent. interest. Yet financial fairy tales of this sort are marvelously successful, and weak human nature, with all reason blinded by that hint of fabulous profit, pins its faith on the impossible.

In stable life insurance there is no fairy tale of any sort. Good life insurance leads one on by no rainbow span which promises pots of (unearned) gold, to be had for a walk across the meadow and up the hillside. It offers just, and needed, and durable results—results sure to be won by all who perform their share of the contract entered upon.

It is the recognition of this fact that has won for life insurance the respect and admiration of the world. Argument is no longer needed to support it. As Secretary Gage has said: "All the sane man asks is, which is the best company?" This question, too, has been settled, for a generation of men have decided that the claim put forward by The Mutual Life of New York is legitimate: "The best company is the company that does the most good." Here is a company that does all it promises—and more; a company that has passed through fifty-five years of business activity with an unblemished record and a world-wide reputation for justice and liberality. Hundreds of thousands have found in it the truest help and the soundest investment. It is this company which to-day offers to you the chance to make like advantages your own—invites you to become "one of the firm."
