

Yale, 6; Holy Cross, 7.

Yale was defeated by the Holy Cross Nine at Yale Field on Wednesday, April 26, the score standing 7 to 6. The University team took a big lead in the fourth and fifth innings and apparently had the game well in hand. In the eighth, however, Robertson, who, had pitched fairly well up to that time, weakened very much, and the visitors made three singles and a three-base hit, scoring four runs, which, coupled with three runs made in the preceding innings, gave them the lead and the game. The Yale team played sharply in the field, but a general weakness characterized their work at the bat. Waddell and Camp, however, hit well, securing five of the seven hits. Robertson's work in the box was not as steady as in previous games, as he allowed five bases on balls, hit two men and made two errors on throws to the bases.

Yale, 23; Brown, 6.

Yale won from Brown at Yale Field on Saturday by the large score of 23 to 6. Yale's terrific batting and Cook's effective pitching were most gratifying features of the game from a Yale standpoint. Sedgwick, who pitched the first four innings for Brown, was succeeded by Woodworth, but Yale continued her heavy hitting throughout the game. deSaulles made five singles, Wallace a home run, a three-base hit and a single, and Quinby two singles and three-base hit. Brown secured six hits off Cook in the first two innings, but then he steadied down and pitched

A KNOX AD.

You notice it generally doesn't say much about the Knox Hat. Why? Simply because we don't like to ring the changes on the assertion that the Knox Hat is the best that can be made. It might look as though a claim were being made, when as a matter of fact we were only repeating a commonplace. Why repeat it?

most effectively, allowing but one hit during the remainder of the game. The work of the Brown team was uniformly weak,—in the box, in the field and at the bat.

CHANGES IN THE NINE.

The Yale team presented three changes in the field, which had been tried in previous practice and promise to be permanent. Waddell was transferred from left field to first base, supplanting Wear, who returned to center field, the position which he has played during the last two years. Quinby in turn was transferred from center field to left field. The score follows:

Our National Game.

[Walter Camp in Collier's Weekly.]

Several years ago, before it became the common lot of the baseball umpire to be assaulted and taken from the grounds under the escort of the police, it is said that a man by the name of Hawes, who had been at one time change catcher for the Bostons, was assigned by the secretary of the League, Mr. Young, to umpire a game between the Providence and Boston nines on the Boston ball grounds. In the course of the game he made some decisions so adverse to the Bostons that it was only with difficulty and by the aid of a cab that he was finally rescued from the infuriated mob. This treatment was at that time so unusual, and made such an impression upon Mr. Hawes, that when Secretary Young advised him, a short time later, of his assignment to another Providence-Boston game in Boston he replied by the following telegraphic dispatch: "I am no hog; I know when I have had enough."

And yet the game has been one, even up to the present day, where the charge that has attended professional sport of other kinds—namely, that of dishonesty—has seldom found lodgment. There have been some cases on record of selling the results, but those cases have been so few as to make it all the more evident that in this respect the sport has no doubtful record.

The bad odor which attends the professional game has had its material effect upon the game in amateur hands, and there is a distinct loss of interest noticeable in the amateur pursuit of the sport. It has become less the fashion even at our universities, and while the Commencement Day games still draw the usual crowd, the smaller games lack that patronage which they used to secure, and the number of men taking an active part in second nines is growing less every year.

All this means that without reform, and serious reform, not reform on paper, the National Game of America is going to disappear, or, rather, become lost in the limbo of rowdyism. If the Englishman can preserve his cricket and football through the trials of, and by the side of professionalism, it would seem possible that the American game might yet be saved from its impending doom by the force of administrative ability when the ability has been set to work with clean hands.

The Dunham Crew, the pick of the class and scrub crews, disbanded last week when it became known that a competitor would not be forthcoming. The Harvard Faculty vetoed the race planned with the Newell Club and as several attempts to have a race in other directions were unsuccessful the only thing left to do was to break up. The men trying for the Dunham eight have returned to the class and scrub crews.
