These figures expressed in percentages of their respective totals would read:

Leaving out of account the figures for foreign birth or residence, these tables indicate that the recent generation of college graduates has moved away from New England and the South Central States into the other sections of the country. In actual extent this interstate migration has been greatest in the case of the movement away from New England, and least in the case of the movement to the North Central States. In relative importance, however, the movement of college graduates to the Mountain and Pacific States stands first.

A truer picture of this interstate migration is given when we take the various streams of migration, often moving in opposite directions and neutralizing each other. This fuller picture is given in the following table, which indicates the movement from each to every other section of the country by giving the percentage of all born in one section who have settled in every other. For lack of sufficient data the figures for the Mountain and Pacific States should be overlooked.

Of the students of the various sections, those in the Middle Atlantic States surpass the others in generally remaining in the section in which they were born. A majority of students of Southern birth settled permanently in other sections. Of New England students roughly one-half remain and one-half move to another part of the country. One-quarter of them go to the Middle Atlantic States, and one-eighth further west to the North Central States; a mere handful move Southward. Of the students born in the Middle Atlantic States, a large majority, as we just pointed out, remain there; of those that leave, an equal fraction goes to the North Central States, and to New England. This movement to New England is more pronounced in the case of students born in the North Central States, 8% of whom settle in New England; almost twice as many (15.8%) settle in the Middle Atlantic section. The very pronounced movement away from the South is also largely directed toward the Middle Atlantic section; those born abroad also join in this movement. The net result of all these various movements is a crowding of the college graduates into that section, especially into the neighborhood of New York City. Whereas 38% of the students of the above ten years were born in the Middle Atlantic States, 45.6% of them have settled there. The typical college graduate of to-day is no longer a scholar, but a man of affairs, and he tends to that section of the country where the growth of population and concentration of industries offer him the greatest opportunity for usefulness and success.
