A Yale Lieutenant Under Fire.

The following is an editorial from the Hartford Courant of June 8. The engagement was on June 19 at Das Marinang. The Americans lost four killed and twenty wounded and when relieved by reinforcements had ammunition for only half an hour more:

"We print this morning another letter from Lieutenant Ward Cheney. This time he tells of the fierce fight the battalion to which he belongs had with the Filipinos, and that came so near being the end of the whole party. A small detachment of Americans, sent forward to reconnoiter, were surrounded by a large number of natives and, owing to the exhaustion of their ammunition, would have been all captured and killed but for the timely arrival of reinforcements. The Chicago Record, received at this office under date of August 4, prints a letter from Imus from its special correspondent, Harry A. Armstrong, describing this same encounter. Correspondent Armstrong is able to write one interesting and gratifying fact, which circumstances prevented young Cheney from putting on paper. Telling of the slow and perilous retreat, Mr. Armstrong says:

"For another hour we fought and crept slowing back, the enemy's fire increasing. Up and down the road the staff officers galloped on their horses. In this work Lieutenant Ward Cheney showed great courage, riding from left to right and dashing his horse through the hedge into the open field to give orders to the right flank."

"After the trouble was over General Wheaton complimented the Fourth Infantry, and said their First Battalion had met an army of 2,000 and held them in check."
