

Corbin's Corner

THE RAGLAN

As you know, this is named from the English General, Lord Raglan. He wore that kind of a coat, but it has been developed since his first wearing of it. It is specially noticeable by the cut of the shoulders.

Raglans will be worn a great deal this Winter in both ulster and overcoat. Rough cloth is used.

MY DAY IN NEW YORK is Thursday. Place, Astor House. Time, 12 to 4.

A PERFECT INAUGURATION.

he was able to say that he wanted to go to N-N-N-New York f-f-f-freight. When asked to explain himself, he said that was the only way, as he could no longer express himself.

The graduates asked for another, but the President declined. Then the call came for ex-President Dwight, and there was another very hearty cheer. Ex-President Dwight had just come down from the country to attend the celebration and was spending the evening at the new President's house. He showed in his face the good effect of his lightened burdens and his good rest, and looked as young as any man in the street. He said that he was pleased with the greeting of the graduates, and said, with a good deal of feeling, he counted himself one of the graduates. He expressed his affection for them all, and hoped that they had the same feelings toward him. He said that the Yale of the future meant still better things for those who would come under it than the Yale of the past had given. "And how good," he added, "has this old Yale been to us!"

President Eliot of Harvard, was next called out, and his greeting by the graduates was very cordial. He addressed them as men who were co-workers with all the university men of America in the service of their common country. He thought the occasion emphasized the point of the stability and permanency of the New England colleges, and the fact that they were one in purpose and in spirit, and were drawing nearer and nearer together in their common work.

There were then calls for President Patton of Princeton, but he was not with that particular party at the time, and so the graduates moved on.

Unique Fancy Hose.

They can't be duplicated in any city in the United States. They are the latest thing in footwear and the price is right.
